Business Challenges

When VP of HR, Marc Farrugia, joined Sun Communities, he received a two inch binder of new hire paperwork—a tangible confrontation of its manual hiring process that needed a boost of efficiency. Only a handful of recruiters managed the recruitment-to-hire process, and much of the company's hiring efforts were decentralized across the organization.

With the company's focus on continued growth and the increased hiring needs during seasonal hiring swells at Sun's newer resort locations, Sun centralized its recruiting efforts and began to implement new processes to create efficiencies. It was clear an end-to-end framework was needed, and the development of a more robust and scalable solution to tackle the company's growth and cyclical hiring needs would be crucial to the company's continued success.

From the very beginning, Marc searched for a solution that would save his team time and remedy the inefficient processes. Over a period of three years, Sun's HR department used four different background screening vendors. To resolve unclear reports, his recruiters bounced around among various support representatives in between unanswered calls or long periods of waiting on hold. "Our recruiters were constantly on the phone, and it was ridiculous," Marc said.

Our recruiters, who are recruiting all day, are living in one system—so they're not wasting time logging into different places. Our end users, who are getting a sense of what it's like to work at Sun Communities, are logging into that system from the earliest points of their employment.

Sun Communities

Additionally, the company's talent management system offered little promise to Sun beyond sourcing, and they were still using three platforms that required manual data entry. Marc knew that he could streamline the HR team's processes with an integrated solution for a better end-to-end experience, but needed more than promising technology modules; Sun Communities needed a true partnership with integrated software-as-a-service solution providers.

I think Sterling Talent Solutions should be an extension of our team when it comes to bringing someone on board to a company, and Sterling helps make that a lot more seamless.

Sun Communities
